

Interest Mounting In Local Bonspiel

The fourth open bonspiel sponsored by the Irma Curling Club is away to a good start with excitement gathering in momentum every day. There are 20 rinks competing, 16 of these are visiting rinks from Mannville, Wainwright, Buffalo Coulee, Hardisty and Fabyan.

A busy group of volunteers went to work the week before the spiel started and renovated the rink kitchen completely. Then a coat of paint was applied to both kitchen and waiting room, linoleum was put on the kitchen floor and dainty curtains at the windows. The lady curlers could only look, sigh, and wish for similar improvements in the home kitchens. However, these innovations have helped so much to enable those who serve lunch to have things handy and attractive.

It's a little early in the spiel to give much of an idea as to how the play is going. Among the Irma rinks are two completely made up of high school boys. These boys under skips Frickelton and Hockett are curling well and have given several veteran rinks a run for their money.

On Wednesday afternoon those rinks which had reached the eight's for the Grand Challenge were N. McMillan, R. McFarland, E. Jones, E. Blanchard and W. Hubman. Those who had worked out to the eight's in the Citizens were Smith of Wainwright, Smallwood, Morrison of Hardisty, Knudson, McFarland, Findlay of Fabyan, Jack McKay.

OUR COMPLETE SHORT STORY—

The Red-Headed Girl

By Louis Arthur Cunningham Like All True Poets, He Was A Solitary Soul.

EIGHT years was enough time to forget about the Poet. No one had ever known him very well, for, like all true poets, he was a solitary soul who confided only in a colt dog suffering the name of Zoroaster. When the Poet went away—like many poets he went to war—he left a little cottage and a garden at the disposal of Judge Wedborne, to be sold and the proceeds given to a university which had thanked the Poet before he could get a degree. The Poet was an impractical person.

There was no one who wept for him except the Red-Headed Girl. And in the years that followed Richard Granville's going, only little flame-topped Sophie Wedborne wondered if he still saw the sun and loved the stars of which he had spoken. Sophie could never forget because he had left her one of his poems, written to her. She was only ten when he went away, and he was twenty-two. Then, too, Sophie had Zoroaster. Granville had given his dog to the Judge, Sophie's father, and Zoroaster had soon transferred its worship to a red-headed mistress.

In the years Sophie grew from an awkward girl into a vision of loveliness. Judge Wedborne died and left the cottage, that he had purchased himself, to Sophie, who went to live there.

Everything in the Poet's house seemed to bring Sophie nearer to him. There were his books, his pipes. She liked to imagine that she lived with him, that he was just away for a long trip and would soon come back, tall and thin, with unfathomable black eyes and wavy black hair.

But how would he greet her? Surely not with the absent words he had for her. To him every strand of her flying mane was a gold thread spun of fairy looms, her lips two strawberries that had been crushed together by apices. The Poet had said all those nonsensical things, and even at ten she had blushed and felt confused and happy. She had never forgotten the day he came to give the key to the Judge. He was in uniform. He sat on the steps and scribbled a verse. Then he bent and kissed her. And Sophie loved him. One day the Poet came back, just as she had known he would—happily, his clothes dusty, his eyes beautiful with a beauty not of this world. But he had aged and he limped where a bullet had smashed his knee. But he was shy and formal. A woman's years between twenty and thirty don't matter; but from ten to eighteen the bloom is in the making. The Poet still lived for the Red-Headed Girl and was loved by her, but for him the sprites were no more.

He had come back on a walking tour. He would stay a week in town and be on his way. He still wrote poems and some of them, clipped from a magazine, he let her read.

Sophie made the little roll of the paper with the verse written when he went to war. She found it round with a strand of the hair she had saved when the scythe of fashion descended on her head. She half-planned to give it to him and trust that he would marry her, but she could not bring herself to do that.

He came to see her the night before his departure. He seemed ill-at-ease; Sophie felt heart sick.

"I think I must say goodbye now, Miss Wedborne," said the Poet. "Thank you for being good to Zoroaster. Where is the old boy?"

He whistled. From the cottage the aged colt ambled. In his mouth Sophie gasped. What he had picked from her workbasket . . . the poem, and the love of her hair. Would he give it to her or to the Poet?

The dog stopped to scratch at a flea. Sophie prayed silently to Eros. Her heart stopped when Zoroaster turned towards her. Again the Poet whistled. And Zoroaster laid the message in his ears.

Sophie did not look at him, but she knew that he was reading. She felt his fingers in her hair. "Sun-beam," he whispered. "I hoped you were the same, but I did not dare to love the woman as I loved the child."

"We of poetic heart never do grow old," said Sophie.

Urge Use Of Straw To Fertilize Soil

SASKATOON, Sask.—Fifty million tons of straw, huge, by-product of Canada's agriculture, is produced annually but most of it is either abandoned or burned.

That's an estimate contained in a recent Canadian Chamber of Commerce booklet, published by its chemistry committee. Authors G. A. Ledingham, J. B. Marshall and J. E. Stone of the national research laboratories at Saskatoon and E. S. Archibald of the Dominion department of agriculture advocate returning that straw production to the soil.

They also urge greater research, both in industrial and agricultural use of straw.

Dr. Archibald said recent tests in western Canada show crop residue including straw from a yield of 10 bushels an acre would return about 900 pounds of organic matter an acre to the soil. Fertility is increased and erosion lessened.

Laboratory technicians, the booklet says, are studying various industrial uses of straw such as corrugating material, containers, structural boards and fuel briquettes.

It was noted that "cereal straw" would give a sheet of white writing paper almost indistinguishable from high-quality wood pulp bond, although such production is not an immediate research objective.

A doctor, who worked two hours before Diane recovered fully, said young Hart saved the baby's life.

Pioneer Likes To Look Back When He Slept With Money

BANFF, Alta.—David M. Soule likes to look back on the days when he had so much money he slept with it. But the night he spent tramping along railway tracks looking for $45,000 in cash stands out as the coldest in his memory. It wasn't the temperature that gave him the chills; it was the fear of losing the money.

Soule then was postmaster at the booming coal-mining town of Bankhead, five miles from here. Once a month the Canadian Pacific Railway, which owned Bankhead Mines Ltd., sent along the payroll in the mail.

The train which brought it never did stop at the Bankhead station, some distance from the town. The mail clerk nervously kicked out the bag in the general direction of the station.

And one night, Soule, waiting there with the buggy team, couldn't find the bag with the $45,000 payroll. He and others, whom he roused out of bed, searched all night along the tracks before they finally found the payroll in a snow drift.

"After that," Soule recalls, "the railway sent the money under escort and I was happy about it. Once a month I would have so much money, I'd always sleep with it in bed with me."

That was only one incident in a life of 66 years. Soule came out from England and worked as a farm hand in Saskatchewan before joining the Mounted Police at Regina in 1904.

He was in Regina when the force was granted the right to use the prefix royal. It changed from North West Mounted Police to Royal North West Mounted Police and because of it there had to be some blue in the uniform.

Modelling for the new uniform and keeping an eye on the Doukhobors provided Soule with his liveliest moments at Regina. Even in those days the Doukhobors held un-
